

Biggest Takeaway from Today's Session

My biggest takeaway from Magesh's session was his practical and experience-driven perspective on communication and credibility in professional settings. The way he emphasized empathy, truly putting ourselves in the other person's situation stood out as a powerful reminder that effective communication goes beyond exchanging information. It is about understanding people. His insights on listening also resonated strongly. He highlighted that in real organizational environments, active listening helps us learn from others' diverse expertise rather than rushing to dominate discussions.

Another lesson that struck me was the importance of emotional regulation while communicating. Magesh explained how decisions made when we are overly happy, angry, or stressed often lead to misjudgement. This realistic example brought clarity to why communication needs a calm and balanced mind.

Finally, his emphasis on reliability as the foundation of credibility was particularly impactful. Delivering commitments consistently, even slightly ahead of time, gradually builds trust, especially when working with global teams who may take time to place confidence in us.

Overall, the session was insightful and grounded in real-world experiences, offering practical guidance that I can apply immediately in both academic and professional contexts.
